Often called bezoar-stone. (The ordinary current sense.)

The original sort was the lapis bezoar orientalis, obtained from the wild goat of Persia and various antelopes, etc.; the lapis bezoar occidentalis, obtained from the lammas of Peru, was less valued; the chamois yielded German bezoar.

In India the leaves and seed-capsules are chewed or smoked, or eaten mixed up into a sweetmeat, and sometimes an infusion of them is drunk. The name is sometimes extended to an intoxicating substance prepared from the resinous exudation of the plant, called by the Arabs hashish.

Bi, ME. variant of BY, a town.

Bi, freq. ME. spelling of BY pref.: the same as Bi- pref., the early OE., and the ordinary ME., form of the prefix BE-; under which spelling see most of the words. Those alone are left under Bi- which did not survive long enough to be spelt with be-.

Bi- pref., a. L. bi- (earlier dui-, cogn. with Gr. δι-, Skr. dui-) 'twice, doubly, having two, two-', which is in Latin a prefix of adjs., occas. of sbs., rarely of vbs. (e. g. bipertire). The earliest Latin adjs. of this type are formed by simply prefixing bi- either to adj.- (and verb-) stems, as bifer, bifidus, bijugus, bisonus, or to sb.- (and adj.-) stems, as bicolor, biceps, bifrons, bifurcus, bigenus; later in all probability, and more evidently mere compounds, are those in which bi- is prefixed to an adj. with a thematic suffix, as bicorniger, bicubitalis, bilongus, bipatens, and these are occas. participial in form, as bicameratus, biformatus. The Latin sbs., ending usually in -ium, are formed on the prec. adjs., or possible ones of corresponding type, as biennium a space of two years, biennis lasting two years, biclinium, biclinus*.

The prefix entered Eng. in composition, e. g. in bigam (= med. L. bigamus), found c 1300, bicorne, c 1420; bifront, biforked occur late in 16th c.; and from the 17th c. onward, by a wide extension of the Latin analogy, especially in its later phases, bi- has been prefixed to any adj. conveniently indicating the thing or quality which is to be described as doubled or occurring twice, principally to those of Latin etymology, as in biangular, bicavitary, bicentral, bivaulted, bivoluminous, but also to others as birainy, biweekly. In modern scientific terminology, adjs. in -ate, -ated are most frequently employed, as biauriculate, bicarinat, bilamellate, bipinnate, biunguiculate, bimaculated; and the attrib. use of sbs. as adjs. tends to such modern forms as bichord, biwhirl. (See also the form BIN-.) Bi- is therefore used in Eng. to form:—

The conjecture of Diez that it is:—L. bifax, bifacem, explained by Isidore as duos habens obtutus 'looking two ways', is rejected by later Romanic scholars as phonetically untenable. Originally an adjective, as in Pr. via biayssa cross or oblique road; but early used as a sb. in French, so that the first quotable example in Eng. is of the subst. use. The latter became a technical term at the game of bowls, whence come all the later uses of the word. With pl. biases, cf. allases, croscuses.]

2. A term at bowls, applied alike to: The construction or form of the bowl imparting an oblique motion, the oblique line in which it runs, and the kind of impetus given to cause it to run obliquely. Thus a bowl is said 'to have a wide or narrow bias', 'to run with a great' or 'little bias'; the player 'gives it more' or 'less bias' in throwing it.

It is difficult to decide in which sense exactly bias was here first used. A priori we think of the oblique line of motion: this is favoured also by the quotations under C. and BIAS-WISE; yet early quotations here point rather to the oblique one-sided structure or shape of the bowl. Formerly bias was given by loading the bowls on one side with lead, and this itself was sometimes called the bias; they are now made of very heavy wood, teak or ebony, and the bias given entirely by their shape, which is that of a sphere slightly flattened on one side and protuberant on the other, as if composed of the halves of an oblate and a prolate spheroid.

(= Pr. bibla, Sp. and Pg. biblia, It. bibbia; whence also Ger. bibel, Du. bijbel, all fem.): late L. biblia fem. sing., for earlier biblia neut. pl., the Scriptures, a. Gr. τὰ βιβλία, lit. 'the books,' in later Christian writers spec. 'the canonical books, the Scriptures.'

The Gr. βιβλία was pl. of βιβλίον, dim. of βίβλος (i. the inner bark of the papyrus, 'paper'; 2. a paper, scroll, roll, or book), which had ceased to have a diminutive sense, and was the ordinary word for 'book,' whether as a distinct treatise, or as a subdivision of a treatise, before its application to the Jewish and Christian Scriptures. In reference to the former, see τὰ βιβλία τὰ ἁγία 'the holy books,' in 1 Macc. xii. 9; in Clemens Alex. probably, and Origen (in Joannem v. iv., ed. Lomm. I. 168) c 223, certainly, τὰ βιβλία include the N. Test. books. In Latin, the first appearance of biblia is not ascertained. Jerome uses bibliotheca for the Scriptures, and this name continued in literary use for several centuries. Of biblia, Becker, Catal. Biblioth. Antiq. 42, has a 9th c. example (see also those under sense 1 below); but the evidence of the Romanic langs. shows that biblia must have been the popular name, and have been treated as a fem. sing., much earlier than this. The common change of a Lat. neuter pl. into a fem. sing. in -a (as in arma, bat-talia, folia, gaudia, gesta, opera, etc.) was in the case of biblia facilitated by the habit of regarding the Scriptures as one work. In OE. biblīpēce alone occurs; in Anglo-Latin biblia and bibliotheca interchange in the 11th c. catalogue of the library of Lindisfarne; in the 13th c. catalogue of the Durham books only biblia occurs.]

[Bicched appears rather early to be certainly referable to BITCH in an opprobrious sense, from which moreover the formation is not easily explained (for shrewed there was a verb to shrew). The conjecture has been offered that it was a contracted form of ME. biwicced 'bewitched'; but for this no evidence or analogy has been found. In bicched bones applied to dice, some have suggested a corruption of Du. bikket 'knuckle-bone, astragalus, cockal, bone-plaything, dice, marbles'; Ger. bichel 'ankle, ankle-bone, astragalus, die, dice'; this is possible, but would suppose an Eng. series bikkel*, bicchel*, bicche, bicched bone, of which the most important links are neither represented nor accounted for, and it would only show assimilation of bikkel* to the opprobrious bicched, leaving the latter unexplained. That bicched bone could be for a *Du. bikched been 'bone picked with holes or pips,' is highly improbable: moreover, this would not connect the expression with Du. bikket, since the latter (whether or not connected with bikkel a pickaxe, bikken to pick, or notch) certainly did not mean 'bone picked with holes,' but was a name of the ankle, and of the astragalus or knuckle-bone used in play, long before it passed over to dice. B. Biddan; bidden, bidde; bid. Forms: 1 biddan, 2-5 bidden, (2-3 biden, 3 bedden), 3-6 bidde, 4-6 bydde, (4 bedde, bide), 4-5 bidd, 4-6 byd, (5 byde), 4- bid. [A. OE. bíðan, bíad, budon, boden, = OS. bíðan (MDu. and Du. bieden), OHG. bītan (MHG. and mod.G. bieten), ON. bíða, Goth. bīdan (pa. t. baup, budum, pple. budans): -OTeut. beudan* 'to stretch out, reach out, offer, present', hence 'to communicate, inform, announce, proclaim, command'; pre-Teutonic bheudh-*, cogn. with Skr. budh 'to present, and perh. with Gr. πύθω (for φύθω) in πύθισθαι 'to inform oneself'. From the pa. pple. boden was derived the sb. boda messenger, whence the vb. bodian to BONE, announce. The normal ME. forms were bide(n), pa. t. bead, bíd, bed, pl. buden, pa. pple. boden. But by form-levelling, the pa. t. had also pl. báden, bíd(e) from the sing.; and later also bod(e), by assimilation to the pa. pple.

B. OE. biddan, bæd, bédum, beden, = OS. biddian (MDu. and Du. bidden), OHG. and mod.G. bitten, ON. bíða, Goth. bīdan (pa. t. baþ, bédum, pple. bidans): -OTeut. bīðjan*, assigned to a pre-Teutonic bhedh-* 'to press' (cf. Skr. bádhat 'to press'), whence the senses 'to ask pressingly, beg, pray, require, demand, command.' (Osthoff would connect bīðjan with Gr. πείθω.) The normal ME. forms were bide(n), pa. t. bad, pl. beaden, bede(n), pa. pple. beden. By form-levelling the pa. t. had also occasionally sing. bead, béd, beed, and at length pl. baden, bade, bad; and the pa. pple. became bidden, whence also a later pa. t. bid.

C. Thus the sense 'command' had been developed in both verbs already in OE. The past tenses were further confused in form in ME. The result was the frequent substitution of the forms of one verb for the other, in other senses also, and their total confusion after 1400-1500. As a whole, the forms of biddan, bid are those which survive in literary Eng., but in the dialects these are quite mixed, in such conjugations as bid, bad or bod, bodden or budden. Senses survive from both verbs, though mostly archaic, or in certain unanalysed phrases, as to 'bid farewell', 'bid a truce', 'bid fair'; the chief modern use is that of 'bid at an auction', 'bid for votes or support', which belongs to bede. The senses of 'invite' and 'order' are in every-day use in the north, but archaic in southern speech, where 'bid him do it' is regularly made 'tell him to do it'. Particular forms of the pa. t. and pa. pple. are preferred with particular senses.]

A. Senses originating from OE. bíðan, ME. bede, but taking eventually the form bid.

The bede quotations are marked α, the bid quotations β.

6. Bidding of beads, beads-bidding; bidding of prayers, bidding prayer. As to these expressions there has been a series of curious misapprehensions. The original meaning down to the Reformation was 'praying of prayers,' i.e. saying of prayers, praying; cf. BID v. 7 e. From an early date in the Christian church, it was the custom to request the prayers of the faithful in behalf of certain persons and things; and in the 16th c., in England, forms of allocation or direction to the congregation, telling them whom and what to remember in 'bidding their beads' or 'prayers' were authoritatively put forth. As bid in the sense of 'pray' was now becoming obsolete, the meaning of the expression was forgotten after the Reformation, and bid taken in the sense of 'order, direct,' so that in the reign of Elizabeth the 'bidding of prayers' was applied to the allocation itself, as if = 'the directing or injoining of prayers.' With the later use of the vbl. sb. as a gerund directly governing an object, we have in the 17th c. 'the form of bidding prayers' or 'prayer' (= precatio-nem hortandi); and later still, a misunderstanding of the grammatical construction in this phrase has given rise to the vulgar error of calling this exhortation to the people (in which 'conciatores populum hortabantur ut secum in precibus concurrat' Sparrow Collect. Articles, 1671) 'the bidding-prayer,' as if it were itself a kind of prayer qualified by the attribute 'bidding.'

[In OF. Bigot appears first in the romance of Girart de Roussillon (12th c.) as the proper name of some people, apparently of the south of Gaul. Hence already in the 17th c. it was suggested by Caseneuve, that it might be an OF. form of Wisigoth, Visigoth; the relations between the Visigoths of Toulouse who were Arians, and the Franks who were Catholics, being such as readily to attach to the name of the former the connotation of 'detestable foreigner' or 'foreign heretic.' But modern Romanic scholars find phonetic difficulties, besides that there is no evidence that the name Wisigoth was preserved in the vulgar tongue. Slender support to some connexion with the Goths is suggested by the med. L. form Bigothi (Du Cange). Whether the Sp. bigote, moustache, is in any way connected, cannot be decided. According to Wace bigos, bigos was applied opprobriously by the French to the Normans, which shows that the word had then acquired some connotative force; the legend that it originated in the refusal of Hrolf or Rollo to kiss the foot of Charles the Simple, when, in the words of the 12th c. chronicler, 'lingua Anglica (!!) respondit Ne se, bi got, quod interpretatur Ne per Deum' (No by God!), is absurdly incongruous with facts. The opprobrious sense in Wace was certainly not that of 'superstitious' or 'hypocrite', as in later F. and Eng.; materials to show how the latter was developed are wanting, but there is evidence to show that the feminine bigote was subsequently applied in opprobrium to the Beguines (see Beguta, Bignita, in Du Cange): our first quotation identifies bigot with bigin or beguine. In early times the word became a Norman family name as in Roger Bigod earl of Norfolk.]

6. A note of charges for goods delivered or services rendered, in which the cost of each item is separately stated; also known as a bill of parcels.

In modern use, confined in this sense to the professions and to retail trade, and implying a demand for payment. In wholesale transactions, an 'invoice,' containing the usual particulars of a bill, is supplied on delivery of the goods, and the formal demand for payment is made by a 'statement of account' sent in when the money is due. Bill is however often loosely used for 'invoice,' and vice versa.

Bin (bin), sb. Forms: 1 binne, 2-3 binne, 4-6 bynne, byn, 5-7 bene, 7-8 bin, 1- bin. [OE. binne (str. fem. 'manger, crib, hutch, bin'. In later times a good deal confused with BING.]

Francq compares Du. beun, MDu. binne fem. 'fish-cauf.' Others would refer OE. binne directly to late L. binna, applied to various vessels or receptacles, among others to a 'hamper' and a 'vivarium' for fish, and apparently identical with binna, given by Festus as a Gaulish name for a kind of vehicle (cf. Welsh ben 'cart, wagon'), inferred to have been a wicker- or basket-cart, which sense, with that of 'panier for pack-horse', 'large creel', etc., is preserved in It. binna wicker-work sleigh, dung-cart, f. binne 'grape-gatherer's creel, fish-cauf, basket-cart for charcoal', binne panier, basket-cart (also mod. G. binne, Du. binne, ben, large basket, adopted from Fr., It., or med. L.). IF Oceltic binna orig. meant a wicker-work panier (with or without wheels), a root ben-, bun- to twist, plait, may as Franch suggests have been common to Celtic and Teutonic. (See Diez, Du. Cange binna, in Littré, Scheler binne, in Franch ben, beun.)

Bin, pref., treated as a euphonic form of Bi-*pref*², used before vowels. Not found in L.: it seems to have originated in Fr. with the word binocle, which was probably formed from L. *bin*i two together, a pair of (boves bini a pair of oxen yoked together). From binocle, binocular, bin- has been extended in English to other words, esp. chemical compounds (see Bi-*pref*² III) as binacetate, biniodide, binoxalate, binoxide (for which Fr. has bioxyde). The phonetic analogy of a-an, co-con-, has probably influenced this Eng. use.

2. Any feathered vertebrate animal: a member of the second class (Aves) of the great Vertebrate group, the species of which are most nearly allied to the Reptiles, but distinguished by their warm blood, feathers, and adaptation of the fore limbs as wings, with which most species fly in the air.

Now used generically in place of the older name Fowl, which has become specialized for certain kinds of poultry, and by sportsmen for wild ducks and wild geese. In this sense, bird, ME. brid, is found in the south c 1300; it appears to have been extended from the young of birds (sense 1) at first to the smaller kinds, Chaucer's 'smale foules.' So late as a century ago, Dr. Johnson says (1755-73) 'In common talk fowl is used for the larger, and bird for the smaller kind of feathered animals'; and this distinction still obtains to some extent dialectally. (In Scotland large birds e.g. hawks, herons, are 'fowls', small birds, as well as chickens, are 'birds'.) A further process of specialization (cf. the histories of fowl, deer, beast), seems still to be in progress in regard to bird, as witness its technical use by game-preservers (sense 3).

1. A spiritual superintendent or overseer in the Christian Church.

a. Used in the New Testament versions to render the Gr. word ἐπισκοπος, applied to certain officers in early Christian churches, either as a descriptive term, or as their actual title. In Wyclif, the Rhemish, and Revised Versions, the Gr. word is so rendered in every instance; but in the other versions from Tindale to 1611, it is in Acts xx. 28 (where applied to the πρεσβύτεροι or 'elders' of Ephesus) rendered 'overseers.' Also applied to Christ, as descriptive of his office. (Sometimes applied by those who do not recognize the episcopal order, to their pastor or chief elder, but only as a descriptive term, or as identifying his office with that of the New Testament 'bishop'.)

1382 WYCLIF Acts xx. 28 Al the folk in which the Holy Gost sette 300 bischops. 1868 LIGHTFOOT Philippians 93 It is a fact now generally recognized by theologians of all shades of opinion, that in the language of the New Testament the same officer in the Church is called indifferently 'bishop' ἐπίσκοπος and 'elder' or 'presbyter' πρεσβύτερος.

b. spec. In the Eastern, Western, Anglican, and other churches of episcopal order: A clergyman consecrated for the spiritual government and direction of a 'diocese,' ranking beneath an archbishop (where these exist) and above the priests or presbyters, and deacons. (This is the sense in which the word passed with Christianity into all the Teutonic langs., and thus the earliest sense in English.)

Bishop in partibus infidelium in R. C. Ch., one dignified with the title of a bishopric, whose district or diocese is in the possession of infidels or heretics; originally applied to those expelled from the Holy Land by the Saracens.

The Old English wesend having been long obsolete, the word has come back to us through Latin, in which guise it can hardly be looked upon as Eng. before the 17th c., and has become familiar only in connexion with the American Bison. It is in Minshew, Coles, Phillips 1678-1706, and Kersey; but not in Cockeram, Blount, Bailey 1721-90, Johnson, nor Richardson 1836-55: it was added by Todd to Johnson, 1818. 1. orig. A species of Wild Ox (Bos Bison Gesn., B. bonassus Linn.), formerly prevalent in Europe, including Great Britain, and still existing in a protected state in forests of Lithuania. (This was the Bison of Pausanias and Oppian, the Bovaeos of Aristotle and Aelian, the bison and bonassus of Pliny and Solinus, the bison of Seneca and Martial; pl. bisontes, in later writers visontes, vesontes, bisontes. As will be seen on comparing the next word, there were two OTeut. sbs. derived from this verb, of which the senses 'act of biting', 'piece bitten off', were not uniformly distinguished in the different langs. In OE., bite 'act of biting, bite', and bita 'piece bitten off, morsel, bit', were distinct, but both became bite, bit in ME., and both are now bit, so that they can be distinguished only by tracing the history of their senses. In the general sense the former is now represented by the later sb. BITE, but bit is retained in numerous specific uses, esp. that of the biting part of a tool.]

This remaining of a large body of men under arms all night explains the original sense of bivouac.]

Bl(a), Blaad: see BLAE, BLAD, BLADE.

Blab (blæb), sb.¹ Forms: 4-7 blabbe, C-blab. [The history of blab and blabber, and the question of their mutual relations, if any, is very obscure. Blabbe sb. 'chatterer' occurs in Chaucer c. 1374, and is very common thenceforth; blab sb. 'chatter, loose talk' is in Tale of Beryn (c. 1400), but has not been found elsewhere before the 16th c., when appears also blab vb. 'to chatter' (1535), followed in course by its agent noun blabber. But the vb. blabber is earlier than any of these; it occurs in Piers Ploughman (1362), and is (with its deriv. blabberer) very common in Wyclif; the facts thus forbid us to take blabber as a frequentative derivative of blab vb.; while no analogy exists for the formation of either (of the only two early words) blabbe sb., blabber vb., from the other. It would be hardly justifiable to assume blabbe to be a 14th c. abbreviation of blabberer. For forms akin to blabber in other langs. see that word. With blabbe we have to compare a sb. labbe 'revealer of secrets, blabber,' in Chaucer, and a vb. labbe of same age in P. Ploughman, with pple. labbyng 'blabbing, open-mouthed,' also in Chaucer, identical with ODu. labben to chatter 'garrire' (Stratm.). Blabbe might be a mixed form due to association of labbe and blabber; but may also be purely onomatopoeic. Cf. BABBLE.]

1. An open-mouthed person, one who has not sufficient control over his tongue; a revealer of secrets or of what ought to be kept private; a babbler, tattler, or tell-tale; used also of the tongue. Sievers suggests that the original Teutonic types were blēkno*, blakko*, subsequently levelled to blēko, blako, blakko, giving the OE. and ON. words; in this case blēkno* might be pa. ppl. of a vb. blēkan* to burn (cogn. v. Blackguard (blæ'gärd), sb. and a. (Written 6-8 as two words, 7-8 with hyphen, 8-9 as one word.) [lit. Black Guard, concerning the original application of which there is some doubt. It is possible that senses 1 and 2 began independently of each other; or the one may have originated in a play upon the other, black being taken with a different sense; it would be difficult to assign priority to either. It is even possible that there may have been a guard of soldiers at Westminster called the Black Guard, or that, as some suggest, the attendants or torch-bearers at a funeral, or the link-boys of the streets, may have had this name.]

The following quotations, including the earliest known, show this uncertainty: they may belong to ascertained senses, but cannot be certainly located:

Blade (blæd). Forms: 1 blæd, 4-5 blæd, 5 blæde, blæad(e), blæyd, 6 blæid, 3- blæde. [Com. Teut.: OE. blæd, neut., (pl. blado, bladu) = OFris. bled, OS. blad (MDu. blad, Du. blad, LG. blad), OHG., MHG. blat (mod.G. blatt), ON. blað (Sw., Da. blad) :—OTeut. blado-* m; perh. a ppl. formation (with suffix -do- do:—Aryan -do-) from OTeut. verbal stem blō-*, see BLOW v. 2, cognate with L. flōs. The long vowel in ME. and modern Eng. appears to be derived from the oblique cases and plural, blād-es, blād-o, made in ME. into blā-des, blā-de. The 15th c. northern spellings blayd, blaid, and Chaucer's dissyllabic blade, blæde, require explanation. The sense-history is notable: in German blatt is the general word for 'leaf', laub being the foliage collectively of trees; in Norse 'herbs or plants have blāð, trees have lauf'; but in OE. lāf is the general word for 'leaf' and 'foliage'; blæd occurs only once, (as it happens, poetically, in the brād blado of the plant of wickedness), and this sense is quite absent in ME., while that of the 'blade' of an oar (also in OE.), of a sword or knife, is frequent. It would almost seem then that the modern 'blade' of grass or corn is a later re-transfer from 'sword-blade'; while in regard to corn, there is some reason to suspect influence of med.L. bladum, OF. bled corn, wheat; at least these were evidently supposed to be the same word. The mod.Sc. 'cabbage-blade' also is prob. not directly connected with the OE.; but Norse influence may possibly have contributed to a retention of the vegetable sense in the north.]

I. Of plants.

Blak, obs. form of BLACK and of BLAKE.

†Blake, a. Obs. exc. dial. Also 3-4 blao, blak. [Chiefly northern: probably therefore, since OE. d remained in the north as ā (e.g. ake, stane, mare), blake was the direct phonetic descendant of OE. blāc pale (in early southern ME. blac, bloke), a common Teut. adj. = OS. blāc, ON. bleikr, OHG. bleih, OTeut. blaike* = shining, white, pale, f. root of blifan to shine, BLIKE. Cf. the synonyms BLEAK, BLEYKE, BLEKE. In Eng. the notion of 'shining,' i.e. white from excess of light, passed entirely into that of 'pale,' i.e. white from deficiency of colour, dead white. This added to the formal confusion with BLACK, since 'dark' and 'pale' alike express deficiency or loss of colour.]

1. Pale, pallid, wan: implying deficiency or loss of colour, esp. of the ruddy hue of health, or of the full green of vegetation; of a sickly hue: thus passing on one side into 'ash-coloured, livid,' on another into 'withered yellow,' whence sense 3.

(Many early instances of blake may be examples of blak black, with final e inflexional or phonetic, the context leaving the sense uncertain. Some early forms written blac, blak, also stand for blāh, blake, and belong here. See what is said under BLACK of the confusion of the forms of blac and blāc already in OE.)

The normal southern form would have been blokien, bloke(n), of which there are a few 13th c. instances: see BLEKE v. In spelling, this vb. was confounded with blākien, blāken to grow black or dark (see BLACK v.); and at length became obs., its place being taken by bleyke(n), bleike(n) from ON. and by the cognate bleke(n) and BLEACH.]

Blatant (blæ'tant), a. Also 6-7 blattant. [Apparently invented by Spenser, and used by him as an epithet of the thousand-tongued monster begotten of Cerberus and Chimera, the 'blatant' or 'blattant beast', by which he symbolized calumny. It has been suggested that he intended it as an archaic form of bleating (of which the 16th c. Sc. was blaitand), but this seems rather remote from the sense in which he used it. The L. blatre to babble, may also be compared. (The a was probably short with Spenser: it is now always made long.)

But clearly identical with ON. blesi 'white star on a horse's forehead,' MDu. blesse, Du. bles, mod.G.
blässe, blesse, all in same sense, from stem blas-, blas-shining, white; cf. OHG. blāss whitish, MHG.
blas bald, mod.G. blas pale. It is possible that the ON. word was adopted in north. dial., and thence passed at a later date into general use;
but the Du. or LG. form may also have been introduced as a technical term c. 1600.

(In either case the spelling has to be explained: the regular repr. of ON. blesi would have been blesse, blesse; if this occurred in north. dial., it would be identical with the northern form of BLAZE¹, and might, like it, be made blaze in the literary language; if adapted from Du. or LG., blaze must be a phonetic spelling.)

(pa. pple. once in 6 blasen; cf. Ger. geblasen, same word as ON. blāsa to blow (as the wind, with the mouth, bellows, a trumpet), OHG. blāsan

(MHG. and mod.G. blasen), MDu. and Du. blāzen, Goth. blāsan (in uf-blāsan to blow up, puff up):
O Teut. blāz-an*, f. root blā-* (Aryan bhlē-*, L.
flā-re: see Blow) with suffixal -an (perhaps from the present stem) taken into the root. The verb (blāz-an*) was not preserved in OE., where it was represented only by the derivative sb. blāz-f, BLAST 'blowing.' The ME. vb. was prob. a. ON. blāsa (unless direct connexion with LG. or Du. blasen, blāzen, can be traced). Its later history is confused with that of BLAZON, evidently through associating the infinitive blas-en with the pre-existing sb. blason, BLAZON 'shield, heraldic shield.' The proper senses of blaze and blason, acted and reacted upon each other in the 16th c.: see senses 3-6, and BLAZON v. 4-6. In later uses of sense 2, there may also be often traced an association with BLAZE v. 1, as if to 'blaze abroad,' were to 'expose to the full blaze of publicity.']

of 'shoulder-blade.']

Ble, obs. f. BLEA sb.; var. BLEE, Obs., colour, etc.

-ble, a. OF. -ble: -L. -bilem, nom. -bili-s, suffix forming verbal adjs., with the sense 'given to, tending to, like to, fit to, able to'; as in sta-bili 'like, fit to stand.' After consonant stems, -ibili-, as vend-i-bili, vinc-i-bili; after stems ending in a, e, i, o, u, -abili-, -ibili-, -ibili-, -ibili-, -ibili-, as honōrā-bili, delē-bili, sepeli-bili, nō-bili, volū-bili. Some of these L. words lived on into OFr., e.g. noble, amable, feble, meuble; later, these became models for the extensive adoption of others from the Latin of literature. Many of both sorts were from 12th to 15th c. adopted in Eng. from Fr., and here served as models for the direct adoption or formation of others from Latin, a process which has gone on to the present day. By far the most numerous of the -ble words are those in -able. In L., -abili- adjs. arose only from verbs in -āre; but, in Fr., all pres. pples. in -ant may give rise to an adj. in -able, and as -ant is now the universal form of pres. pple., -able is the universal form of the adj. suffix as a living element; -ible being only a fossil survival in words from L. like horrible, possible, visible, not directly attached to a living Fr. verb. When the verb lives in Fr., a modern adj. in -able has always taken the place of the earlier -ible form, as in vendable, croyable, préférable, for L. vendibilis, credibilis, præferibilis*. But in Eng. there is a prevalent feeling for retaining -ible wherever there was or might be a L. -ibilis; while -able is used for words of distinctly Fr. or Eng. origin, as conceivable, movable, speakeable. Hence, where there is a verb in French and English, as well as in Latin, English usage is distracted by conflicting and irreconcilable analogies. Thus in the compounds of -fer, L. fero, Latin analogy requires preferible, referible (Walker, Rhym. Dict.), sufferible; French example gives preferable, referable; Fr. and Eng. analogy sufferable (cf. suffering); Eng. analogy (cf. refer-ring) gives referable (Bailey), conferable, deferable; there is also a mongrel spelling referrible, sanctioned by Dr. Johnson, but defensible on no analogy. So with the variant spellings: admittable, -ible, tractable, contractible, partable, -ible. These discrepancies no mere etymological grounds can settle; though their number might be lessened by following French precedent, and extending -able to all words having a verb (with the same accent) in Eng., thus admittable, contractable, corruptable, exhaustable, vendable, etc., leaving -ible in credible, intelligible, legible, possible, etc. See -ABLE, -IBLE. The omission or retention of a final e mute before -able is also to a certain extent optional. In words directly from L. it is etymologically absent, as in excusable, declinable; in words from Eng. (beside cases where it must be orthographically retained after c, g, as peccable, changeable, chargeable, the latter also in Fr.), there is a prevalent feeling for retaining the e in monosyllables, as tameable, nameable, saleable, which otherwise would have their meaning obscured (e.g. tamable, namable, salable). This produces ambiguity of form in such words as blamable (F. blâmable), blameable, movable, moveable, lovable, loveable, sizable, sizeable, etc. As much reason can be given and as much authority cited for one spelling as for the other, and until a reform of Eng. spelling is made, the double form of these words must continue. In words of English formation, a final consonant is usually doubled before -able, when doubled in the pres. pple., as clubbable, biddable, defferrable. As to the meaning, Palsgrave (1530) says (p. 302):

'Of every adjective participle . . in ant may be formed an adjective by chaunging of ant into able, as of muant, muable; honourant, honorable; . . whose significacion may serve bothe actively and passively, as muable, apte or mete or able to chaunge, or . . to be chaunged; honorable apte or mete or able to honour or . . to be honoured. . . In this thyng the french tonge is moche more parfyte than our tonge is, for where as they may forme of every participle in their tonge an adjective endyng in ble, in our tonge we have none suche, but must nedes use circumlocution by . . apte, mete, or able, and our infinitive mode; save that we have admitted as well adjectives of the french tonge endyng in able and ible, as commendable, visible, etc.'

As here stated, adjs. in -bili-, -ble, were originally active (and neuter) as well as passive. Many of the former exist in Eng., e.g. capable, comfortable, suitable, agrecable, conformable, companionable, durable, equable; but the majority have become obsolete or remain only with a passive force, as in credible, audible, flexible, which is also the only use of -able as a living formative, e.g. bearable, catale, likeable, preferable, insufferable, saleable. (For exhaustive treatment of these words see F. Hall Eng. Adjectives in -able; London 1877.)

Its exact relation to these normal forms is not easily determined. Bleke, bleak may have been the northern form of bleche, BLEACHA; cf. BLEAK v. = BLEACH v.; but there is no evidence of its having originated in the north. It is also possible that it was a 16th c. spelling of bleyke, blayke, from ON., or even of the northern dial. blake; or that it resulted from a blending of bleach, with bleyke or blake. Blench, a., Sc. form of BLANCH a., where see Blench-farm, etc.

Blench (blenf), v.1 Forms: 2-3 blenchen, 3 (blinche), 3-5 blenche, 4- blench. Pa. t. 3-4 bleinte, 4 bleynte, blynchid, 4-5 blent. [A word or series of words of very obscure history. Sense 1 is evidently:—OE. blencan to deceive, cheat = ON. blekkja (= blenkja) to impose upon, which point to an OTeut. type blankjan*, assumed to be the causal of a strong blinkan* to BLINK; but, as no trace of the latter occurs in early times, the origin of blencan is thus left uncertain. The northern form was BLENK, q.v. The sense-development is involved, from confusion of blenk and blink, of blench and blanch, prob. also of the pa. t. blent with blent pa. t. of BLEND v.1, and other causes: little can be done at present except to exhibit the senses actually found in use.] To cheat, elude, turn aside. Related to BLENK and BLINK.

Evidently akin to BLAND sb. mixture, and the OE. strong vb. bland-an, ON. blanda (Sw. blanda, Da. blande) to mix: see BLAND v. But the ME. vb. (however the change of vowel may be explained) can hardly have been a continuation of the OE. blandan, since this was all but obsolete already in OE., while blenden was a common word from the 14th c. More probably the latter was an adoption of the ON. blanda (which though originally strong, had subsequently weak inflexions); the change of vowel may also have been due to the ON. sing. present blendr: whether any association with BLEND v. 1 (with which it entirely coincides in forms) or other extraneous influence contributed, does not appear. But later identification with BLEND v. 1 is shown by the occasional use of blynde for this verb also. The 16th c. blenne was either phonetic, like the converse len, lend, or deduced from the pa. pple. blend.]

1. tion of blétsian, if it were the original form, would be from blót sacrifice, on OTeut. type blótsi-* jan; but besides that blédsian actually occurs earlier, the change of ds to ts is phonetically natural, while the reverse is not.) The etymological meaning was thus 'to mark (or affect in some way) with blood (or sacrifice); to consecrate'.
But the sense-development of the word was greatly influenced by its having been chosen at the Eng.
conversion to render L. benedicere, and Gr. εὐλογεῖν, which started from a primitive sense of 'speak
well of or to, eulogize, praise,' but were themselves influenced by being chosen to translate Heb.
בָּרַךְ, primarily 'to bend,' hence 'to bend the knee, worship, praise, bless God, invoke blessings on, bless as a deity.' Hence, a long and varied series of associations, heathen, Jewish, and Christian, blend in the Eng. uses of bless and blessing. Senses 4-6 arise mainly from benedicere, εὐλογεῖν. At a very early date the popular etymological consciousness began to associate this verb with the sb.
BLISS 'benignity, blitheness, joy, happiness,' which affected the use of both words (see esp. senses 7, 8), and led to occasional ME. spelling of the vb.
with i, y.

1. The pa. t. and pple. are now generally spelt blesse, though always pronounced (blest) in modern prose; the pple. may be pronounced (ble'sed) in verse, or liturgical reading. As an adj. blesse (ble'sed) is now the regular prose form, but the archaic blest is frequent in verse, and traditional phrases as e.g. 'the Isles of the Blest.'

1. Orig. meaning (prob.), To make 'sacred' or 'holy'
with blood; to consecrate by some sacrificial rite which was held to render a thing inviolable from profane use of men and evil influence of men or demons. (The streaking of the lintel and door-posts with blood, Exod. xii. 23, to mark them as holy to the Lord and inviolable by the destroying angel, was apparently the kind of idea expressed by blódsian in pre-Christian times. Cf. also the history of the Latin words consecrāre and sacri- ficium.) Hence, in historical use:

1. I. To make sacred, consecrate, hallow.

1. trans. To consecrate (a thing) by a religious rite, the utterance of a formula or charm; in later times by a prayer committing it to God for his patronage, defence, and prospering care, as in to bless food, to ask God's blessing on it (cf. 5).

When said of men, the sense has passed into that of officially or paternally commending to divine protection and favour.

a 'snow-squall,' the word became general in the American newspapers during the severe winter of 1880-81; but according to the Milwaukee Repub- lican 4 Mar. 1881, it had been so applied in the Northern Vindicator (Esherville, Ill.) between 1860 and 1870. It was apparently in colloquial use in the West much earlier; but whether Col.
Crockett's use of it in 1834 (sense 1) was fig., taken from the stifling blast, or was the earlier sense, and subseq. transferred to the blast, is not determined.]

Bloat (blōt), a. 1 Also 3-6 blote, 7 bloate.

[The spelling bloat occurs in this sense earlier than in that of next word, with which this is often identified, though in the present state of our knowledge it is safer to keep them distinct. The ME.
blote is perhaps identical with ON. blaut-r in the sense 'soft with moisture, soaked, wet'; or from a parallel form blōt*: cf. the ME. vb. blotne, ON.
blotna to soften, moisten (see BLOTEN), also Sw.
blöt soft, moist, yielding. But it would also answer in form to OE. blāt 'livid, pale', though this sense is less likely. Sense 2 recalls ON. blautr fiskr, i.e. 'soft fish', applied to 'fresh' fish, but in Sw. blöt fisk, to 'soaked' fish (Vigf.). Though evidence of actual connexion is wanting, it is conjectured that the Eng. 'bloat herring' is, in some way, identical with these, and means, etymologically, either 'soft (moist) herring', in opposition to 'dried', or else 'soaked, steeped herring', in reference to part of the process of curing the herrings so termed. In Act 18 Chas. II. ii. 'bloated' is opposed to 'dried', and it is explained by Blount as 'half-dried'; but most of the quotations give it as meaning (in actual use) 'smoked', (smoking being an important part of the process).
One at least (1613 below) appears to identify it with 'puffed up', and thus with sense 2 of the next word, whereas Sylvester, in 1616, says 'Herrings shrink in bloating'; but moist herrings are naturally plumper than those more thoroughly dried.

Bloat (blōt), a. 2 Forms: 1. 'oute, 6-7 blowt, 7- bloat. [Apparently distinct at first (as an Eng. word) from the prec., since the earlier form of that was blote, but of this blout; though of parallel origin, and, since the 17th c., identified in form, and often associated in meaning. ME.
blout, blout, was the regular adopted form of ON.
blaut-r soft (as a baby's limbs, a bed, silk; see Vigf.); cf. Sw. blöt 'soft, yielding, pulposus, pulpy'.
The later form bloat does not answer phonetically to blout, blout, yet its modern use is largely owing to the 'blowt king' of Hamlet having been printed 'bloat' by editors since Warburton, 1747;
G. Daniel had also spelt the word in this way
c. 1640-50. Possibly BLOAT a. 1 in 'bloat herrings', (found as early as 1602) was in the 17th c. a much better known word than this, and being, rightly or wrongly, identified with it, influenced its form.
It is to be noted that BLOAT v., and its derivatives BLOATED, BLOATING, are all of earlier use as applied to the herring, than in senses connected with this word. Sense 2 is a natural enough extension of 1; but it may have been influenced by association with blow, blown; the mutual influence of this and the prec. since 1600, cannot be settled without more definite knowledge of the exact notion at first attached to 'bloat herring'.]

trans. To cure (herrings) by a process which leaves them soft and only half-dried. This is now done by leaving them in dry salt on a floor for 24 hours, washing in fresh water, spitting, and smoking them over an oak fire for a period varying from 24 hours to 3 or 4 days, according to the time they are to be kept before being eaten. (Earlier authorities speak of their being steeped for a time in brine before smoking; which has to be remembered in discussing the original meaning of bloat.)

Bloated herrings are opposed to dried or red herrings, which are left in dry salt for 10 days, and smoked for 14 days, whence their deep colour and shrivelled dryness.

Blond, blonde (blond), a. and sb. Forms: 5 blonde, 7- blonde, 8- blond. [a. F. blond, blonde yellow-haired, 'a colour midway between golden and light chestnut' (Littre), = Sp. blondo, It. biondo:—med. L. blondus, blundus yellow (explained in a passage quoted by Du Cange 'flavus qui vulgo dicitur blondus'). Origin uncertain: see Diez and Littre. In English used by Caxton (in form blounde); reintroduced from mod. Fr. in 17th c., and still so far treated as French, as to be usually written with final e when applied to a woman, esp. substantively, a blonde; otherwise commonly written blond like the Fr. masculine.

Cf. OE. blanden-sear, blonden-sear having mixed or grizzly hair, grey-haired, old; also beblonden, given in Bosworth as 'dyed', both from blondan to mix, BLAND v. Hence Du Cange, s.v. Blundus, conjectures the original sense to be 'dyed', the ancient Germans being accustomed to dye the hair yellow.]

Blue blood: that which flows in the veins of old and aristocratic families, a transl. of the Spanish sangre azul attributed to some of the oldest and proudest families of Castile, who claimed never to have been contaminated by

2. As an intensive: Very... and no mistake, exceedingly; abominably, desperately. In general colloquial use from the Restoration to c 1750; now constantly in the mouths of the lowest classes, but by respectable people considered 'a horrid word', on a par with obscene or profane language, and usually printed in the newspapers (in police reports, etc.) 'b — y'.

[The origin is not quite certain; but there is good reason to think that it was at first a reference to the habits of the 'bloods' or aristocratic rowdies of the end of the 17th and beginning of the 18th c. The phrase 'bloody drunk' was apparently 'as drunk as a blood' (cf. 'as drunk as a lord'); thence it was extended to kindred expressions, and at length to others; probably, in later times, its associations with bloodshed and murder (cf. a bloody battle, a bloody butcher) have recommended it to the rough classes as a word that appeals to their imagination. We may compare the prevalent craving for impressive or graphic intensives, seen in the use of jolly, awfully, terribly, devilish, damned, ripping, rattling, stunning, thundering, etc. There is no ground for the notion that 'bloody', offensive as from associations it now is to ears polite, contains any profane allusion or has connexion with the oath 's blood!'

I saw that at the Hall. 1743 FIELDING Wed. Day iii. vi. This is a bloody positive old fellow. 1753 FOOTE Eng. in Paris ii. (1763) 29 She's a bloody fine Girl.

Blow (blōw), sb. 1. Forms: 5 Sc. and north. blaw, 6 blōe, 6-7 blowe, 6- blow. [First found in 15th c., the earliest instances being Sc. and north. Eng. with form blaw. Origin doubtful.]

(The etymology of blow has been naturally sought in the stem of the OTeut. vb. blēwan*, Goth. bligēwan to beat (which is not related to L. fligere), in OHG. blīwan, MHG. blīwen, mod.G. bläuen 'to beetle, batter, beat, drub' (whence bläuel a beetle), MDu. and mod.Du. blow-

were 'to beat, thrash, drub', now esp. 'to brake or swingle flax or hemp' (whence blowel a brake for flax). The OE. cognate would have been blowan*, but of this no trace is found, and it is not easy on any theory to understand its giving rise to a substantive in the 15th c. without ever appearing itself. It is still less likely that an English substantive could be formed from the Du. blowen or its Ger. equivalent, when there is no such substantive in these langs. ('Du. blowe' in J. is a figment.)

Another suggestion which suits the form and accounts also for the early Sc. and north. English variant blaw, is that this is the same word as Blow sb., or at least, like it, derived from Blow v. The difficulty is, that, as to the sense, early uses of the word do not indicate any such origin, while historically, Blow sb. (in its own undoubted senses) is of later appearance. The analogy of Fr. soufflet, also, in which a word for 'a blow with the flat of the hand' arises out of the vb. souffler 'to blow wind', though striking at first sight, proves on examination of the history of soufflet to be merely superficial.]

Bludgeon (bludʒən). [Not found before the 18th c.: origin unknown.]

Blogon (with g=j) is quoted by Dr. Whitley Stokes from the Cornish drama Origo Mundi (? 14th c.), but its rela- tion to the English is uncertain. Other Celtic etymologies sometimes proposed are on many grounds untenable. A Du. vb. bludsen to bruise, has also been compared; and it has been suggested that the word is of cant origin, con- nected with blood.]

Blu(e, obs. pa. t. of BLOW v.)

Blue (blū, blü), a. Forms: 3 bleu, 3-8 blew, 4 blu(e, bluw(e, 4-5 blwe, 4-6 blew(e, 7- blue. [ME. bleu, a. OF. bleu, a Common Romanic word (=Pr. blau, blava, OSP. blavo, It. dial. biavo, med.L. blāvus), ad. OHG. or OLG. blāw :-OTeut. blāwō-z blue, whence also ON. blā, like- wise adopted in ME. as bla, blo, now BLAE. The corresponding OE. form blāw (or blēw*) is known only in Erfurt Gloss. 1152, 'blata, pigmentum: havi-biaum', and the derivative blāwen (:=blā- wīno-) 'perseus'. But neither of these survived into ME., where their place was supplied by the adoption of ON. blā, in sense of 'lividus', and of F. bleu in sense of 'caeruleus'. The OTeut. blāwō was perh. cognate with L. flāvus yellow (though blāwō-z would be the expected Teutonic form), the names of colours having often undergone change in their application; thus OSP. blavo was 'yellowish-grey'. (The guess that blāwō was derived from the stem bluwan*, Goth. bligg- wan to beat, as 'the colour caused by a blow' is not tenable.) The present spelling blue is very rare in ME., and hardly known in 16-17th c.; it became common under French influence only after 1700. In pronunciation, nearly all the diction- aries still recognize (blū), but the more easily pronounced (blü) is general in educated speech.]

Blue-stocking (blū'stɒkɪŋ), sb. [As an attributive phrase, with the sense of 'wearing blue stockings', this is found as early as the 17th c. (see 1 a.); in its transferred sense it originated in connexion with re-unions held in London about 1750, at the houses of Mrs. Montague, Mrs. Vesey, and Mrs. Ord, who exerted themselves to substitute for the card-playing, which then formed the chief recreation at evening parties, more intellectual modes of spending the time, including conversation on literary subjects, in which eminent men of letters often took part. Many of those who attended eschewed 'full dress'; one of these was Mr. Benjamin Stillingfleet, who habitually wore grey or 'blue' worsted, instead of black silk stockings. In reference to this, Admiral Boscawen is said (Sir W. Forbes Life of Beattie (1806) I. 210 note) to have derisively dubbed the coterie 'the Blue Stocking Society' (as not constituting a dressed assembly). The ladies who supported the reform were at first called Blue Stockingers, Blue Stocking Ladies, and at length, about 1790, when the actual origin of the term was remembered by few, Blue Stockings, in later slang abbreviated to Blues.]

Bluff (blɒf), sb. 1 [f. BLUFF a.] A cliff or headland with a broad precipitous face. (First used in N. America, and still mostly of American landscapes.)

1757 WESLEY Wks. (1830) I. 63 Savannah stands on a flat bluff, so they term any high land hanging over a creek or river. 1776 L. MCINTOSH in Sparks Corr. Amer. Rev. (1853) I. 150 A bluff or sandhill thirty feet high or more above the water. 1830 LYEAL Princ. Geol. xv. (1850) 211 The... boundaries of the alluvial region... consist of cliffs or bluffs, which on the east side of the Mississippi are very abrupt, and are underminded by the river at many points. 1837 W. IRVING Capt. Bonneville (1849) 45 The wild and picturesque bluffs in the neighborhood of his lonely grave. 1842 TENNYSON Gold. Year 76, I heard... the great echo flap And buffet round the hills from bluff to bluff. 1865 GEIKIE Scen. & Geol. Scot. vii. 188 Bold bluffs, that mark the limits of an ancient shore.

Bluff, sb. 2 Obs. or dial. [Belongs to BLUFF v. 1: analogically with bridle, bit, blind, cover, either the verb or the sb. might come first and give rise to the other; here the accessible evidence is in favour of the priority of the verb, though, in the obscurity of the etymology, certainty is not at present possible.]

1. A blinker for a horse.

1777 DARWIN Squinting in Phil. Trans. LXVIII. 88 Bluffs used on coach-horses. 1831 EVANS Leicestersh. Gloss. (E. D. S.) Bluff, anything used to cover the eyes, such as a blinker for a horse, a board fastened in front of the eyes of a bull or cow to prevent its running, the handkerchief used to bandage the eyes in blind-man's-buff, etc.

2. slang. 'An excuse.' Mayhew Lond. Labour I. 217 (in a list of slang words). † A false excuse intended to blindfold or hoodwink, a 'blind'.

3. The action of bluffing at cards, in the game of poker; see BLUFF v. 1 and cf. BRAG. Hence, challenging or boastful language or demeanour, not intended to be carried out, but merely 'tried on' with the design of frightening or influencing an opponent who allows himself to be imposed upon by it. (First used in U.S.)

1848-60 BARTLETT Dict. Amer., Bluff, a game of cards. So in WEBSTER 1864. 1866 Harvard Mem. Biographies I. 400 It is a very magnificent game of Bluff that we are playing. 1883 L'pool Daily Post 22 Jan., The whole is a bluff to influence the... election next week. 1889 Pall Mall G. 3 Nov. 1/1 A bold bit of play in the game of bluff... between St. Petersburg and Sophia. 1894 Boston (U.S.) Jm. 25 Sept., The offer was only a bluff.

Bluff, v. 1 [Immediately related to BLUFF sb. 2 'a blinker for a horse', which, as it appears later than the verb, was presumably named from it, though the reverse is also possible. The etymology is quite unknown: the meaning 'blind-fold, hoodwink' does not appear to have any possible connexion with BLUFF a. or sb. 1; the word is probably one of the numerous cant terms (see BAM, BAMBOOZLE) which arose between the Restoration and the reign of Queen Anne. Sense 2 had certainly originally the same meaning; but it looks as if recent users imagined a connexion with BLUFF a. or sb. 1, and made it mean 'to blindfold or hoodwink by assuming a fictitious bold front'.]

1. trans. 'To blind-fold or hood-wink'. Bailey.

1674-91 RAY N. C. Wds., Bluff, to blind-fold. 1706 in PHILLIPS. 1721 in BAILEY: [so in all edd. to 1800. Not in JOHNSON, not in ASH.] 1881 EVANS Leicestersh. Gloss. (E. D. S.) s.v. Bluff, 'Ah'm glad yew'n got that ther bull o' yourn bluffed.'

2. In the game of poker: To impose upon (an opponent) as to the value of one's hand of cards, by betting heavily upon it, speaking or gesticulating or otherwise acting in such a way as to make believe that it is stronger than it is, so as to induce him to 'throw up' his cards and lose his stake, rather than run the risk of betting against the bluffer. (Of U.S. origin.) Hence, transf. of other wagering, political tactics, international diplomacy, etc. To bluff off: to frighten off or deter (an opponent) by thus imposing upon him as to one's resources and determination.

1864 SALA in Daily Tel. 29 Sept., How can you hope to 'bluff' those who are such consummate masters of the game of brag? 1871 Daily News 4 Jan., The great point... is the shutting in of Paris, and the 'bluffing off' of France. 1885 N. York Weekly Sun 13 May 2/7 He went his whole heart, soul, and pocket on three aces and was bluffed by his opponent with a pair of trays.

3. intr. To practise or attempt the imposition described in 2; to assume a bold, big, or boastful demeanour, in order to inspire an opponent with an exaggerated notion of one's strength, determination to fight, etc.

1885 Sat. Rev. 1 July 4. Nor is a Government always to be reproached because when it bluffs it fails. Sometimes a great country is entitled to take the benefit of ancient policy of courage, and to see what effect it can produce by the mere terror of its name. 1883 Longm. Mag. Sept. 498 By sheer bluffing—in other words, by lying. 1884 St. James's Gas. 12 Jan. 4/1 There seems little reason for one party to keep on 'bluffing' when the other party has 'called'.

Hence Bluffable a., capable of being imposed upon or influenced by bluffing.

1885 Sat. Rev. 30 May. The whole thing is... a game of bluff against a player who is known to be bluffable.

Bluff, v. 2. Obs. or dial. [! Onomatopoeic, associated with blow, puff. According to Halliwell, 'A tin tube through which boys blow peas in the Suffolk called a "bluff".' Cf. BLOUGHT, BLOUGHTY.] intr. To swell out, become distended.

[ME. blondren; of uncertain origin: a good deal depends upon whether the ME. -on- here, as often (cf. wonder, sunder), stands merely graphically for -un-, or is etymological. In the latter case an explanation of blonder as a frequentative of blond, BLAND v., to mix, would well account for the transitive senses. The suggestion that it is a frequentative from Icel. blonda to doze (Sw. blunda to shut the eyes), suits the intransitive senses, but is otherwise doubtful; cf. however BLUND. Perhaps there are really two distinct verbs, with their later senses affected by each other.]

[It is uncertain whether the adj. sense gave its name to the fabric, or whether the name of the fabric was transferred to its colour. The original form of the word is also doubtful, though blunket is both the earliest and by far the most frequent. This makes it doubtful whether it can have been an adoption of OF. blanquet, var. of blanchet, dim. of blanc white (and thus originally the same as BLANKET), a derivation which would to some extent suit the sense.]

A. adj. Grey, greyish blue, light blue.

Blunt (blʌnt), a. and sb. Also 3 Orm. blunnt, 5-6 blont. [Etymology unknown: found in Ormin c 1200, in a sense which has suggested some connexion with ON. blunda to doze, blunda augum to shut the eyes, blundr dozing, sleep (Vigfusson). It has been proposed to explain the form as a contracted pa. pple. for blunded, blund, ON. blundad, blundat; but pa. pples. in -nt from -nd are not found so early as 1200; Ormin has none. And this would hardly give the required sense, since blunda was intransitive in ON., and the pple. could hardly exist there. Other suggestions are that blunt might be some kind of side-form of blind, or a nasalized deriv. of an OTeut. root blut*-, whence ON. blaut soft, weak, mod.G. blasz naked, Fris. blat, bleat naked, OE. blāt wretched. But in the present state of the question these are mere conjectures, having no contact with the history of the word.]

Blush (blūz), v. 1 Pa. t. and ppl. blushed, blusht (blūst).

Forms: 4-6 blusche, blushe, blusht, blust.

4 blusche, 4-5 blysche, 5 blushe, 6 bluss, 6-blush. (Rare pa. t. in 5 blis = blysoht). [Evidently related to a series of words found in Old Norse and Low German, but not known in OHG. or Gothic, pointing back to a stem blusi-* from verbal root blūs-* in sense of 'burn, glow, be red'. Cf. OE. blyssian* in ablišan to blush, ablyssung, ablyssung 'redness of confusion, shame', with MDu. blösen, blösen (from earlier bleusen), Du. blozen to blush, blos (formerly bleus) blush, MLG. blosen, bloschen; also OE. blysa wk. masc., blysig wk. fem., ON. blys neut. 'torch' (Sw. bloss torch, blossa to blaze, Da. blus torch, blusse to blaze, to blush), LG. blüse flame, blüsen to set on fire, blüsteren to inflame, glow, become red. The nearest relatives of ME. blusche, blosche, blysche, are app. MLG. bloschen, LG. blüsen (Brem. Wb. I. 105): and its antecedent form is perhaps to be found in OE. blyscan, bliscan 'rutilare' (in the Alahelm Glosses, Mone Q. und F. 355): but its comparatively late appearance in ME., apparently first in the north, its various vowel-forms, and the doubtful relations of the senses, esp. sense 2, all combine to leave the history of the word very obscure. OE. blyscan, bliscan, has also been conjectured to be for blyscian*, from root blik-* to shine, in which case it would not be related to the blüsi- words, nor to ME. blusche. (The Da. deponent bluse to blush, may also be compared.)]

(The order of the senses is uncertain; with 1 and 2 cf. BLINK.)

Blusne, var. of BLYSNE v. Obs. to shine.

Bluster (blʊstə), v. Also 4-5 blustre, 4-6 blustre, 6 blaster. [It is very doubtful whether the obsolete ME. sense 1 has any connexion with the later word in the other senses. With the former Mätzner compares the LG. blustern, blistern 'to flutter or flap the wings in alarm like a frightened dove, etc.', which perhaps may be a parallel onomatopoeia. The 16th c. word has evident relations both in form and sense with the verbs BLOW, BLAZE v. 2, and BLAST: cf. especially ON. blástr sb. 'blast, breath, blowing, hissing' with the form blasterand in G. Douglas (= BLUSTERING ppl. a.). Prof. Skeat also compares an East Frisian blüsteren to bluster, from blüsen to blow, akin to blasen; and it is worthy of note that the Sc. pronunciation is (blüster). But evidence is wanting as to the actual introduction of the word about 1500.]

[A word or agglomeration of words of complicated history, representing two originally distinct sbs., already blended in OE., and subsequently reinforced in ME. by French uses of one of them, and possibly by Scandinavian uses of one or both. (1) OE. had *bord*¹ neut. 'board, plank, shield, table', a Common Teut. str. neut. sb., = OFris. and OS. bord (MDu. bort -de, Du. boord 'board', bord 'shelf, plate, trencher'), MHG. and mod. G. bort 'board', Goth. baurd in fofubaurd 'foot-stool', ON. borð 'board, plank, table, maintenance at table' (Sw. and Da. bord table) :- OTeut. bord-o(m), repr. an Aryan bhr̥dham, Skr. bṛdham*: see BRED sb. (2) OE. had *bord*² 'border, rim, side, ship's side', esp. in phrases innan, utan border, also a Common Teut. sb., orig. str. masc. but often also (by confusion with *bord*¹) neuter: cf. OS. bord masc. († neut.), MDu. bort, boort -de, Du. boord masc., 'border, edge, ship's side', OHG., MHG. bort masc., mod. G. bord masc. (and neut.) 'margin, border, ship-board', ON. borð neut. 'margin, shore, ship-board' (Sw., Da. bord 'ship-board') :- OTeut. bord-oz* side, border, rim. (3) Relationship between these two words is uncertain: Franck suggests that *bord*² is a ppl. form from vbl. root ber- to raise, representing an Aryan bhr̥tós* 'raised, made projecting'. But the two were associated and confused at an early date: in most of the Teutonic langs., some of the senses of the masc. word, in ON. and perh. in OE. all of them, have gone over to the neuter. It is certain that the sense 'side or board of a ship' belongs to *bord*²; so prob. did that of 'shield', the original sense being 'rim, limb, or border of the shield'; the sense 'table' is doubtful. (4) The WGer. *bord*² masc. 'border, edge, coast, side, ship's side' was adopted in Romanic, giving med. L. bordus, It., Sp., Pg. bordo, F. bord. In the ME. period, and subsequently, the French use of the word has in return greatly influenced the Eng., so that certain modern uses and phrases of board are really from French. It is also possible that the development in ME. was in some points (see branch II.) due to Scandinavian uses.]

14. On board (beside the technical sense in 12 c) has now, in common use, the meaning: On or in a ship, boat, etc.; into or on to a ship. That this expression is elliptical, is witnessed by the fuller form on ship-board (cf. ME. 'within schippe burdez' in 12), and the construction 'on board of the ship', or 'on board the ship' (where it is perhaps often supposed that 'board' means the deck).

On board appears to be a later expansion (cf. afoot, on foot) of ABOARD, a-board, and this to have been taken directly from Fr. à bord, as in aller on monter à bord, être à bord, short for au bord du vaisseau, in which bord 'ship's side' comes contextually to be equal to 'ship' itself. Similar phrases are used in other modern Teut. langs., as Du. aan boord, Ger. an bord, Sw. Da. om skibsbord. Although on borde occurs poetically in OE., and upon borde in ME., in sense of 'in, upon ship', these appear to have no historical connexion with the later a-board, which begins about 1500, and on board, which appears late in the 17th c.

16. The name given in some colliery districts to each cutting or excavation in the direction of the working in the method called 'board-and-pillar', or 'post-and-stall' work; 'a passage driven across the fibres or grain of the coal'. Newcastle Mining Terms.

[Found in beginning of 18th c.: the coal was then dragged from the 'face' in sledges over wooden boards or deals laid down as 'ways'. It is suggested that board thus came to mean 'way', 'passage'. Cf. Boardways Course in 18.]

Various conjectures and comparisons may be seen in Wedgwood, and E. Müller, but nothing to purpose. The phonetic history of bost, showing ME. long o surviving as mod. Eng. long o (as) in north, as well as standard Eng., shows that bost is not:—OE. bōst*, which would have given north ME. bost, mod. boist (cf. ghaist, maist, Sc. for ghost, most); nor:—OE. bōst*, which would have given mod. boost, north. buist; nor:—OE. bōst*, which would have retained short o (cf. froist); but from a word of later (foreign) introduction. Its phonetic analogues are the Romanic words in -ost, with the o lengthened in later Eng., coast, roast, loast, hōst, pōst, which would lead us to expect an OF. boster*; but of this no trace has been found.]

Boat (bōt). Forms: 1-3 bát, 4 bot, 4-5 boot, (4-6 boote), 4-7 bote, 6-7 boate, (6 botte, boitt, 7 Sc. pl. bottles), 6- boat; north. 4-6 bate, 5-6 bait, bayt, (5 pl. bat(t)is). [OE. bát: the subsequent phonetic history in Eng. is perfectly normal; but the origin of the OE. word, and its relation to forms in other languages presents difficulties.

OE. bát (unless onomatopoeic) must have been either the regular representative of an OTeut. baitō-* (-u-), or an adoption of a word bát from some other language. (1) The chief relevant fact in Teutonic is that ON. had also bát- in the sense 'small boat', whence regularly Sw. bát, Da. baad 'boat'. But the OE. and ON. words were not cognate, since the ON. form corresponding to OE. bát would have been bait-*, while the OE. form corresp. to ON. bát- (= OTeut. baitō-) would have been bát, bét, giving mod. Eng. beet. In one of the two langs., therefore, bát- must have been adopted from the other: the accessible evidence is on the whole in favour of its priority in OE. This is further favoured by the actual occurrence in ON. of a neuter sb. bait 'boat' (Hávamál st. 90, etc.), which, exc. in gender, is the required form corresponding to OE. bát, from OTeut. baitō-*. It is therefore highly probable that the OE. bát is original, and bát an ON. adoption of it. (2) In any case the absence of the word from continental West Germanic is remarkable: here an OTeut. baitō-* would have given OS. bét, Du. beet, OHG. beiz, Ger. beiss; an OTeut. baitō-* would have given OS. bát, Du. baat, OHG. bás, mod. G. bass. No such forms exist; on the contrary, mod. Du., LG. and mod. G. have actually boot: of these the Ger. word is a recent adoption from LG. or Du. boot, found in early MDu. c. 1250, the o of which can be accounted for only by its adoption from early ME., or from Scand., at a date when the o of these langs. had already become ö. (3) A stem bát- or bait- must have had an early diffusion in Romanic: cf. F. bateau, OF. batel, Pr. batelh, Cat. batell, Sp. batel, It. batello (Florio), now battello, diminutives from a primitive bāto*, batto (the latter actually used in It. in sense of 'small sea-vessel'), OF. bat 'small boat' found in 12th c.; med. L. had also bātus, battus (the former app. only in English documents, the latter (as well as batellus) continental. But no etymology of these is found in Romanic; on the contrary Diez can only refer them back to OE. bát: this is extremely improbable; and the difficulties are only a little lessened by substituting ON. bát as the presumed source. Moreover this derivation requires bātus* as the original type, while the form really indicated by OF., med. L., and It. is battus*. Unless the latter could be a neben-form of bātus (cf. It. tutto, beside L. tūtus, Sp. todo etc.), it could hardly have any etymological connexion with English-Norse bát-. A Celtic source has been frequently attributed to both the OE. and Romanic words; but Celtic scholars now know that the cited OWelsh bat, Welsh bad, is merely an adoption of the OE. word. (4) Campbell points out that, in MDu., boot fem. meant 'cask', as in mod. Sc. meal-boat = 'cask, barrel, tub', prob. identical with F. botte, Pr. and Sp. bota, It. botte, med. Lat. bota, butta, Butt; and suggests that this may bear at least upon the Du. and LG. boot: it is true that words of general sense like 'vessel', vaisseau, and specific words like 'tub', have been applied to ships and boats; but besides that no vestige of any such sense as 'cask, tub', etc. appears either in ON. or OE. bát, these last could in no way be connected in form with bota, botta, or butta. (5) The conclusions at present tenable are, therefore, that apparently there was an OTeut. baitō-*, preserved only in ON. bait and OE. bát; that the latter was also adopted in ON. as bát-r, and that either from Eng. or Norse the word was adopted in Low Ger. and Dutch, as bát, boot. But that the Romanic batto, báto, and its family, arose out of the English-Norse word is very doubtful.]

Bocardo, bokardo (bɒkɑːrdo). [In med. L. the logical term goes back to the 12th or 13th c.

On the question of its relation to senses 2, 3, there appears to be no evidence: the conjecture has been offered that the prison may have been named in jocular reference to the impossibility of directly reducing this mood to the First Figure, or because it was considered an awkward form of the syllogism to get out of. The mutual relation of senses 2 and 3 is also uncertain: so far as the evidence goes, 2 may be a specific use of 3, or 3 a generalized application of 2. If the prison was named from the scholastic term, there would be an appropriateness in the name being first given in Oxford.] 1. Logic. A mnemonic word, representing by its vowels the fifth mood of the third figure of syllogisms, in which the premises are a particular negative and a universal affirmative, and the conclusion a particular negative, the middle term being the subject of both premises: thus some M is not P; all M is S; some S is not P.
